Thus one sex is always somewhat tionship of men and women on a plane of of a mystery to the other, especialist the woman to the man. When a man it costs. The need is not the identity of thinks that he understands a woman functions, but equality of opportunity." completely he had better think again.

"In primitive human life woman fulfilled the reproductive and industrial functions, while men were protective and military. At first these functions were equal in value, but as society developed the premium was placed on the military functions. This meant the subjugation of woman by man. In one word, the long story of the gradual emancipation of alarms in half an hour in the downtown womanhood is the record of the freeing of the industrial functions of society from day morning as he was about to sound an the domination of the military functions." Dr. Griggs said that the industrial revolution had brought men and women to work side by side in competition in factories. Industrially, he said, that means the arrival of a new type of woman. "The same change has taken place in creasingly the satisfaction," he continued of their lives, not in the woman who subordinates herself, but in an individual personality, self-centred and self-directed and able to give and take in the great elations of human life."

He said that the clinging vine type has a hard time unless it finds the supporting oak tree, and added:

"Our time is therefore one of transition, hard for both men and women, but doubly hard for woman. When a makes shipwreck of the deepest relation of personal life he has many other channels for readjustment, but when a woman makes shipwreck of that relation every effort she makes for self-realization only tightens the chains that bind her. the greatest need to-day is that women men should strive to understand each other.
